Yun Sheng Goes to B-School

During Winter Break, RSPH student Yun Sheng took a course at Emory’s Goizueta Business School. Here is what she had to say about the experience:

I learned about the nature of negotiation, and the different negotiation styles in different cases, such as retail, mergers, management, law suits, job negotiations and political negotiations. I built a skill set in negotiation and improved my tactics for maximizing individual gains and developing healthy, productive, long term relationships.

Emory graduates recommend I take some courses in Goizueta Business School. Students in B-school have at least three years of work experience. Thus, I was able to gain a lot of information about work from them. Students in business school are all good at networking, and you can learn a lot from them. Courses there involve many different areas, such as retail, law, management, and human resources. Students learn to think about issues broadly and it broadens your career path. You may develop an interest in new areas as well.
